PUBLISHERS CLEARING HOUSE SCAM

If you receive an email, phone call, or letter from Publishers Clearing House saying that you're a big winner it's important to be able to tell the difference between a legitimate prize win and A sweepstakes scam. PCH doesn't email or call its big winners If you receive an email, a telephone call, or a bulk mail letter saying that you've won a big prize from PCH, it's a scam. You never have to pay to receive a legitimate PCH win. Scammers extort money from you in exchange for a promise of a prize that never materializes. The truth is you never, ever have to pay to receive a sweepstakes prize from Publishers Clearing House or any other company. If your prize notification asks for money to pay for taxes, to release the prize, to pay for customs, or for any other reason, it's a scam. Don't give out confidential information when you enter. You don't have to give Publishers Clearing House your address, bank account number, driver license number, or any other confidential information when you enter. A check doesn't mean you've won. A popular sweepstakes scam makes it appear that you're not really paying for your prize by handing over a check and asking you to send back some of the money. After all, they're providing the funds, right? Wrong. Those checks aren't legitimate, and you'll be left holding the bill. Verify your wins with Publishers Clearing House directly. If you've gone through the steps above and you're still not sure if your win notice is legitimate, you can contact PCH directly to ask them to verify your prize. Do NOT use the telephone numbers or email addresses included in your win notice to verify your prize. Scammers can fake that information to trick their victims. For example, if you call a number in your win notice, you might reach the scammer, not the legitimate PCH organization. Use the information on the PCH website instead.

If you or someone you know is being victimized, please contact law enforcement immediately.
